Project 1

The first step to improving your credit score is understanding what it means. Your credit score is calculated based on five categories: payment history, debt levels, length of credit history, types of credit used, and new credit.

A good credit score is of critical importance for small businesses relying on their financial reputation. Having a decent credit score gives you the financial flexibility to explore different options and gain the trust you need in the lending industry.

Small businesses can increase their chances of getting funding or a bank loan by improving their credit score. Here are some vital business tips that can help increase your credit score and brighten the prospects of getting the funding your business deserves. It would also help to consult a professional funding company like Fundwise.

Be Sure

Be Sure To Pay Your Bills on Time Paying bills on time is a simple yet effective method of improving business credit. Making timely and consistent payments strengthens your credit score. It improves your chances of a business loan. Try paying your bills on time, even if you're paying the minimum amount.

How A Good Credit Score Helps?

A small business with a good credit score will find it easy to get funding, as banks are more likely to lend money and offer loans. Credit scores of 700+ indicate excellent credit history, and businesses with higher scores may have an easier time getting low interest rates on loans or lines of credit.

Monitor Your Business Credit

Monitoring your business credit report is necessary for effective credit score maintenance. You should make checking the score with the credit bureaus a routine practice and highlight information you consider doubtful or causes a significant drop in your rating. It is essential to address problems identified in the report and carry out proactive decision-making to avoid them in the future.

Warning Signs You Need To Pay Attention To

How do you know if your company is in trouble? Well, for starters, a significant warning sign is a high debt to equity ratio. Things like not having enough cash flow and still paying off debts, mean that bankruptcy might be looming over your head (unless some drastic changes happen relatively quickly). "Day's sales outstanding" can help predict potential issues with the business.

Lower your Credit Usage

Lowering the credit utilization rate will help a small business get approved for loans. A company should aim to keep this rate below 30%. Use credit cards with a low interest rate (i.e., one that doesn't charge an annual fee) instead of multiple ones at high rates. Ensure the total balances across three or more card accounts are less than 20% of your limit. Consider using balance transfer offers when opening new accounts if you are looking to consolidate debt.

Fundwise helps small businesses get the funding they need by giving solid advice regarding their credit score. We make small business funding possible by helping you increase and improve your credit score, making you eligible for financial support from financial institutions such as banks.

There is never a bad excuse for wanting to take a trip. Travel is an exciting way to see the world and take a break from one's everyday routine. However, travel is also an excellent educational tool for a variety of reasons. Even though schooling, books, the internet and other resources exist to educate individuals, travel is still one of the best forms of learning because it incorporates personal experience into the mix. Continue reading to discover a few of the educational benefits of travel.

You Learn History.

It seems that no matter where you travel, you cannot escape a location's history. Whether taking a weekend trip to Washington D.C., a holiday across the pond in London, or even a desert trip to Arizona, all these locations share a common trait: they all have a substantial amount of history. You'll quickly find that this trait applies to all travel destinations around the world. We cannot escape the traces of our ancestors and the people who trekked the lands before us. However, this opens up educational opportunities wherever we go. Even though you may have learned about a historical event in history class, nothing beats actually visiting the land and seeing a landmark in person. Whether you traveled to an area to intentionally study history or not, the chances are that you'll learn a mini-history lesson no matter where you travel.

You Learn New Talents

One of the best ways to experience a new culture is by taking a local class on your trip. This might look like taking a pasta-making class in Italy or learning how to take care of elephants in Cambodia. These experiences take you out of your comfort zone and grow your talents in new and exciting ways. This doesn't mean you'll return home making this a new hobby of yours, but it is a great way to learn new things in an immersive cultural class. This hands-on learning can often be more influential than textbook learning and will likely be a core memory for years to come.

You Learn New Languages

Traveling to new foreign countries gives you an excuse to learn new languages. This doesn't mean that you'll become fluent in various tongues, but knowing some basic phrases can help you get by in another country. Even though you might take a language course already, actually immersing yourself in the culture that speaks that language is a whole other story. In most cases, a language is best learned when you are placed in that culture and able to converse with others. Communicating with native speakers is a great way to put your skills to use and learn from them.

Computer and Technology

Have you recently considered writing blogs? Maybe you've created your own website for your own company, and you want to give people advice on a specific topic. Maybe you are a freelance writer who works from home and might desire to take on blog writing to expand your available services. Regardless of what the case may be, you now wish to know how to write them like a pro.

First, let me start off by saying that writing blogs is always a good idea. If you keep your blogs interesting, people will always come back to check for updates and new blogs. And customers who hire you will always circle back around and hire you again for more work.

According to hubspot.com, approximately 77 percent of all internet users read blogs on a regular basis. And according to marketingprofs.com, an average of around 70 percent of consumers would rather learn about a company or brand from a blog post rather than an advertisement. Those statistics speak for themselves—blogs are needed for a strong internet presence, so if you work on the internet, it is a great idea to learn how to write amazing blog posts.

The point of this blog here, ironically enough, is to teach you and help you write your own blog. Use these tips to write your own practice blogs and then compare them to popular blogs online—see how you measure up. This practice will help you to gain blog writing insights and help you see where you can improve.

Opinion Post Vs. Research-Driven Posts

Some blog posts might be truly off the top of your head. These are called opinion posts. Opinion posts are 100% filled with your thoughts and your thoughts only. That is fine, but if you happen to be writing on a specific topic that requires evidence, you must do research on that topic.

Invest time and source a few web pages worth of vital information that you like and pertain to your topic; then extract the pieces of information that you need for your blog in support of your point/topic. Remember, do not plagiarize. You are simply learning something, and then relaying the information to others through the blog post. Besides, the internet bots have gotten pretty savvy at picking up on duplicate posts and plagiarism. Just don't do it.

Create A Title

People want to be captivated. Always think of a title that makes you want to click on the web page. Don't just create a random title. Also, don't use 'clickbait' to gain traffic. You will attract traffic that is not interested in what you are writing about and your bounce rate will go up, making your post less relevant in Google's eyes—which means bad rankings.

Time to write your post.

Remember, same as with the title of your blog post, make the intro to your blog post captivating to the people who will come across it. No one likes to be bored.

Another thing to note is that you need to have a structure for your blog post, just like any other form of writing. The main structure for a blog post is relatively simple. It should look something like this:

1. Introduction. About two to three paragraphs explaining to your visitor what they are about to read and what they are about to learn.
2. Body. This is where your research and main topic come in. Here, in the body, you will write a few paragraphs sharing what you wish the readers to know and learn.
3. Conclusion. This is where you wrap everything up. You've got your point across, and you have said everything that you felt needed to be said within your blog post—and you've said it nicely. Great job! So now you send your readers off with their newfound information and hope that they put it to good use!
